Notes: I marked these stones and others that were fragmented with white plastic piping a half inch in diameter and 3 feet, 4 inches long, hammered into the ground, to help find the stones and to provide an idea of the row configuration. Several of the stones were buried. I found them with a homemade probe — an old broom handle with a 4-inch nail hammered into the tip and the nail head cut off. One stone appeared to have painted letters, but I could not read it. Two stones had epitaphs in small print at the bottom. Two stones had beautiful etchings at the top, one of a rose bush and the other of a weeping willow tree. I cleaned each stone with a nylon brush (do not use wire), sprayed the letters with water, and applied shave cream. I removed the shave cream with a straight edge of styrofoam, which does not hurt the stone. The remaining shave cream settles into the letter depressions and brings out the lettering so that it can be read. This method also aids in picture taking. After the reading, I thoroughly washed off the shave cream with water that I took to the cemetery in 16 milk jugs. To get over the barbed wire fence, I used two step ladders tied together on each side of a strong fence post. Please contact the land owner before going to this cemetery. It is hard to reach and bulls may have to be contained before you go in. Wear long sleeves and jeans. There are many briars and poison sumac. If you wish to probe, do it after a rain. If you find any more readable stones, could you contact me? My relatives in the cemetery are Isaac Bledsoe, Mary Bledsoe, Elizabeth (Bledsoe) Graves and Anderson Walters, who was married to a Bledsoe.

Ken Bledsoe
